HEIST GONE WRONG

Three young men entered a Houston jewelry store on August 27, 2016, allegedly to get loot, but they encountered an off-duty police officer instead.

Houston Police reported that Officer I. Almasri was working a department-approved off-duty security job at the store when the trio showed up at 5:15 p.m.

One of the men noticed Almasri, who was in full uniform, and opened fire.

“Fearing for his life, Officer Almasri exchanged gunfire with the suspect, but no one was struck,” police said in a news release.

The men ran from the store, but police arrested two of them after a foot chase. They faced charges of aggravated robbery with a deadly weapon, police said. A few days later, officers were still looking for the third man.

BURGLARY TURNED SHOOTOUT

Not too long ago,
 I decided to take a leap of faith and pursued buying a handgun and getting my carry permit. I had always wanted a handgun for self-defense, but like many people had always put it off. Finally, after hearing about a horrific crime that occurred in my area, with my wife's approval, I bought a new Sig Sauer P239 in 9mm and took shooting lessons at a local range. Despite my irrational fears, I found the staff great to learn from and the act of shooting lots of fun.

After completing my familiarization course, I applied for and received my CCW permit. I began to make it a regular habit of carrying my Sig whenever I went out. This included to and from work and whenever my wife and I traveled. One night, after returning home from a late dinner with friends, my wife and I entered our home and quickly realized we were in trouble. Standing in our living room were two individuals who were in the process of robbing our home. They were soon joined by two others who apparently had been in another part of the downstairs section of our home.

My wife and I immediately went into panic mode and froze, not being sure what to do. As we stood there, in an apparent standoff with the robbers, it became clear that at least one of them was armed. They ordered us to separate and started to tell my wife to take them upstairs and show them where her jewelry was. My mind was racing as I could only think of terrible thoughts; both her and I were clutching each other, unwilling to break the security of being next to each other. As if struck by a bolt of lightning, I remembered that I had my Sig in my waistband.

Based upon the danger we were in, pulling my firearm seemed a better idea than just dying. Moving purely out of fear, I managed to push my wife down to the ground as I drew my Sig P239 from my waistband. This move apparently caught the robbers by surprise as they didn't immediately shoot me.

I took multiple shots at the robbers as one of them returned fire. Shots, screams and loud noises filled the living room of my home. Within a matter of moments, an eerie calm came over the house. My wife called 911, and when the police arrived, most of the suspects were taken into custody. Two of the robbers had fled during the gunfight. One robber had a leg wound and another didn't survive. Shortly after that, the police found and arrested the other two robbers.—SR, WV

MOM DROPS HOME INVADER

One night, I was home alone with my baby. My husband works nights and this was normal for me. We lived in a development in the Midwest where the homes were small and close together. As with most mothers, every night I had a routine with my baby. On this particular night, after the bath, we called my mother so she could talk to the baby. During the conversation, I heard something that wasn't quite right.

Since I grew up with guns, we always had one available in our home. It was usually a 9mm, which I practiced with as often as I could. On this particular night, as we were talking to grandma, the sound that I heard was breaking glass. I immediately knew this wasn't right and told my mother to call 911 since I thought someone was in the house. My mother smartly kept me on the line as she called 911 from another phone, and I listened as she gave them my address and situation. As she was talking to 911, I retrieved the 9mm from the locked box where we kept it and took up a position inside my bedroom where I could see the door.

I was too afraid to run over and close the door to my bedroom, so I cradled my baby and aimed. Before I knew it, a shadow came up the stairs, and in a flash a strange man bolted through the doorway and lunged toward us. I shot the intruder and he fell to the floor, screamed in pain, and then all was quiet. I called 911 and screamed at the operator to get the police there and that I had shot an intruder. The intruder turned out to be a known burglar who had been wanted for some time. Thankfully, the police said, it was a good shoot and I had acted the right way. To me, the most important thing was that I kept my baby and me safe, and perhaps some other family down the road. —DM, PA

STALKER TAKEDOWN

A 22-year-old Las Vegas woman was gripped by terror while being stalked relentlessly by her ex-boyfriend. The torment didn't stop until he attempted to break into her home and she was forced to shoot him. Police said one round from her 9mm handgun struck him in the chest.

There had been plenty of chances for the man to take “no” for an answer. Police records show, however, that he became more aggressive with each rebuff. The woman told investigators that she started dating her ex-boyfriend earlier in the year, but his behavior became “obsessive.” She reported that, during one romantic encounter, he bit her face.

“She felt it was really weird and decided to stop seeing him around the end of February,” police said in their report. Within a month, however, the ex-boyfriend started showing up at her home uninvited, “making threats and demanding that she speak to him,” police said. The harassment continued with threatening phone calls and text messages.

“He said he made over 15 Facebook profiles trying to get to her through her friends,” police said in the report. In May the woman was granted a restraining order against the man, but it wasn't served because he didn't have a “regular address,” according to police.

Neighbors observed the ex-boyfriend's behavior and feared him. Consequently, police said, the woman was evicted in July because “neighbors felt they weren't safe.” She moved, but the man still found her. In late August, he made threats to kill himself or go after her family, police said.

One night, at about 1:00 a.m., the woman was watching TV when she heard a loud noise. She looked down the stairwell and saw that the front doorframe had been broken—and her ex-boyfriend's face was in the gap.

The woman grabbed her subcompact 9mm and fired twice, hitting the man once on the right side of his chest, according to police. The suspect fled, but police found him hiding in some nearby bushes. He was treated at the hospital and pleaded guilty to aggravated stalking.

TEXTBOOK DEFENSE

Around 10:30 a.m. on August 22, 2016, a 91-year-old man warned a much younger 30-year-old to back off in the parking lot of a Detroit-area pharmacy.

But the younger man kept coming. His target yelled that he had a concealed-carry license and pulled out his handgun to prove it. Still, the man kept coming.

The 91-year-old man and witnesses told police that the aggressor, Richard Ashford, had some sort of object raised above his head in a threatening manner. That's when the elderly man decided he had enough and shot Ashford in the neck.

Ashford survived and faced charges of assault with a deadly weapon, said Macomb County Prosecutor Eric Smith. "This elderly man's self-defense is an entirely appropriate use of force," Smith said. "Facing imminent assault, he announced that he was armed, made attempts to withdraw, warned again that he held a weapon and fired only when completely necessary. This is a textbook case for why concealed pistol licenses are issued in the first place."

SHOOT FIRST

A man reportedly pulled a gun this past summer on a 23-year-old woman in Glendale, Arizona, in an attempt to rob her, but she shot first.

Frank Taylor, 27, died at the hospital after the shooting, which took place around 1:00 a.m. on August 1, 2016, just outside a convenience store on Camelback Road. The woman, Carol Miracle, ran with her sister to her nearby home and called 911.

The case was sent to prosecutors for review, but no decision was made by the end of August. "Statements were made that Taylor pointed the firearm at her head during the attempted robbery," police said in a news release. "She then drew her own handgun that was holstered on her hip, and shot him one time while she was in fear for her life."

IT had been a pretty average Sunday at the store. I was working with another person that day, and right as I was turning around to head out for a lunch break, someone came through the front door. It was a tall, muscular man with his face masked with a black-and-white bandana and thick, dark sunglasses.

The moment I saw him I immediately knew what was happening, as I had been robbed before at a different job. He pulled out a gun and demanded the money in our register. We complied. He took the money, then forced us into the back room and tied us up with duct tape and zip ties. While he was restraining us, he dropped his gun and the magazine popped out. I saw that it was in fact a real gun loaded with hollow points. He reloaded his gun and re-chambered it, finished restraining us, and then took my keys and left through the back door.

The store's back door cannot be opened from the outside, so once the door had latched I told my coworker that I had a gun—a SCCY CPX-2 that I had received as a birthday present, as well as a concealment holster made by White Hat Holsters—in my backpack and we needed to secure it, call the police and get any customers out of harm's way.

We broke out of our restraints with adrenaline-fueled force and ran to the front of the store. We both told a customer who had come in while we were tied up in the back that she needed to get to safety and that we'd been robbed. She left immediately.

I instructed my coworker to lock the door after her and ran to my backpack, and he stopped to punch the silent alarm. No sooner had I made it to my backpack and the woman had left, the robber, for some unknown reason, re-entered the store. I had my gun in my hands, and I saw that he still had his gun and was acting confused and aggressive, a very dangerous combination. I went into fight-or-flight mode. When he raised his gun at me, I fired and connected with his left shoulder.

He dropped his gun and went down but was struggling to get back to his gun, at which point I fired one more shot that hit him in the chest. This was the first time I have ever genuinely feared for my life, but my priority was protecting my coworker's life and the lives of my customers.

I approached the robber, secured his firearm, checked him for other weapons and then cleared both of our guns, laying them on the counter so that police would see they were clear. After that, I attempted to administer CPR and stop the bleeding, but it was too late. The shot to his shoulder was not bleeding much, but the shot to his chest proved fatal. He died before the police or paramedics got there.

In the aftermath, I found out that the man who was killed was a felon on probation for armed robbery. My friends, family, coworkers, boss and complete strangers treat me like a hero, but I just feel like someone who was forced into a bad situation and did what I had to do.—PB, FL PHD

BACKSIDE BULLET

The air conditioner on the floor, still plugged in, was proof that the noise Marquita Turner heard was a burglary of her home in Birmingham, Alabama.

Two teenagers had attempted to break into her home in the early morning hours. Police said Turner, who was pregnant, shot one suspect, age 17, “in the backside.” The other suspect, a 13-year-old boy, fled before police arrived.

Officers “found the suspect laying on the living room floor suffering from a gunshot wound,” said Lieutenant Sean Edwards, police spokesman.

The wounded teen was hospitalized, and his accomplice was arrested later. “Both were charged with burglary,” Edwards said.
